Best Coquitlam Restaurants - Apart from making and serving alcoholic drinks, a bartender may have several other obligations to complete. In places where a wait staff is not available, duties like stocking goods such as straws, novelty drink umbrellas and napkins, and making drink accoutrements such as skewers or fruit wedges can be performed by a bartender. Re-supplying the bar by taking inventory and buying to ensure a stocked quantity of mixers, beers and spirits is another regular task.

A bartender is usually expected to set the general energy and mood of the room. Depending on the business, there may be a food and drink manager on staff who takes control of stocking duties and preparations. Other staff may be delegated the tasks of basic garnish preparations and other storing duties. This division of duties permits the bartender to concentrate on creating ambiance by interacting with customers, filling drink orders and making blended drinks.

During a regular shift, a bartender has many various things to keep notice of. At times a bartender bills a customer for every drink ordered, while other times they could decide to create an account called a "tab" that the client is required to pay when leaving the restaurant. During a shift, there might be several tabs and different individual orders to take care of, together with the usual drink serving duties requested by both the servers and walk up customers. A bartender generally shares their time between the whole bar area where clients order individual drinks and between the service bar where wait staff receives drink orders. Responsibilities and service requirements vary depending on the business.

Bartenders could be held responsible for the actions of drunk consumers; therefore, they will often stop serving clients who're showing signs of impaired judgment. A licensed bartender has to ensure the safety of the restaurants' patrons and employees, which usually means recognizing when a patron has become intoxicated or unruly. It may be tough at times, but one of the necessary obligations for a bartender is to know when to cut off a customer and to carry out their decision. Often a bartender would leave the intoxicated buyer in the custody of a chosen driver or call a taxi to take the drunk patron home.

A freelance bartender is all the time able to work alone or as a full wait staff. As soon as a shift is over, general clean-up tasks might be needed. These include wiping down work areas, emptying trash, cleaning glasses and restocking coolers. Several bartenders obtain a small hourly wage that's supplemented by tips, so usually a bartender would use up most of their shift moving quick between customers to be able to fill as many orders as possible.
